ENGLISH PLEASURE GARDENS.

Magnificent Heritage of the Tudor Period That is Admirably Maintained.

English gardens are distinguished from those of continental Europe, because they have had a continuous existence and history since Tudor period. Italian gardens were at their best late in the sixteenth century; but thereafter they declined, just as all Italian art declined, says the Architectural Record.

During the eighteenth century the local and cardinal principles maintained them; but they did not build new ones; and during the nineteenth century they have scarcely been kept in repair. The French garden reached its consummate expression in Versailles late in the seventeenth century. The crown so completely overshadowed French life and at that time during the eighteenth century that the royal gardens are something more than royal; they are also national. But since the revolution social and economic conditions have not favored in France the laying out of new and elaborate gardens. Such gardens are a luxury, to be enjoyed only by the very rich, and French wealth tends to be distributed rather than concentrated. Moreover, French people, while they love the country and delight in flowers, are so social that the characteristic expressions of their modern life are urban. They have made Paris a park, but individual Frenchmen have not indulged in elaborate formal gardens for their personal pleasure. In England other conditions have prevailed. Ever since Tudor times there have been residents on the soil an energetic and efficient aristocracy and landed gentry, who were to a greater or lesser extent the real leaders of the country. They have for the most part been prosperous and progressive, living on their estates and adapting their social habits to country life. Consequently throughout the whole of this time old gardens have been altered and new ones built; new ideas and influences have been constantly creeping in; and at the same time the conservative habits of England, the continuity of its life and the comparative absence of revolutionary and military disturbance have all contributed to the maintenance, almost unimpaired, of this magnificent heritage of gardens. There is no parallel in England to the partial decay and ruin of the great Italian and French gardens (for Versailles has not been kept up as it should be under the republic). Englishmen either maintain or improve, or they destroy. It is true that their improvements are more destructive than the negligence of Italians; but it is at least the evidence of a fresh and living interest.

And the old gentleman had wisdom enough to understand the situation exactly.

A Confusing Term.

"Is Mrs. Blinks at home?" asked the caller.

"No," replied the maid, who had heard a term that she did not quite understand; "she's teasing off somewhere."

"Teasing off," repeated the caller. "You mean she's at the gold links."

"No, I don't. I mean she's gone off to a tea party somewhere."—Chicago Post.
